The Daily Press.

Hongkong, September 26th, 1890.

Now that the bench at the Magistracy is again filled by the holders of the substantive appointments it may not be out of place to discuss the propriety of filling temporary vacancies that may from time to time occur with barristers who are allowed to continue their private practice. Desirable it is that trained lawyers should preside at the Police Court, and that when temporary vacancies occur they should be filled from the profession, the advantages, may be more than counterbalanced if the persons so appointed cannot devote themselves entirely to the duties of the office. No serious inconvenience or scandal has so far arisen from the employment of practising barristers, but inconveniences have not been wholly absent and remarks have been passed for which it is not desirable any room should be afforded. The business at the Police Court has occasionally been interrupted, sometimes for several days together, because the Acting Magistrate was engaged in the Supreme Court, and cases that ought to have been disposed of promptly had to be kept under remand. It is no secret, either, that one of the gentlemen who has had an acting appointment at the Magistracy was offered a retainer by the Opium Farmer. It was of course declined, but it was reported amongst the Chinese for a few days that it had been accepted, and the deductions that would draw may be imagined. It has also been suggested that solicitors who practice in the Police Court might consider it advisable to give an occasional retainer in a civil case to the Magistrate, just by way of making things run pleasantly. This, no doubt, is mere empty talk, but amongst a Chinese population the principle that a Government servant, and more especially one in any way concerned with the administration of justice, should under no circumstances be allowed to receive private fees is one that should never be departed from if it can possibly be avoided.

The case of Dr. Barrois naturally suggests itself in this connection. In 1867 Mr. Moxon, the Colonial Secretary, wished to go home, and there was a difficulty in finding a suitable officer to fill the position during his absence. Dr. Barrois, a barrister, who had previously acted as Attorney-General, was appointed. From his own account it would seem that he accepted the office more to oblige Mr. Moxon, with whom he was on terms of friendship; than for any other reason, and he showed subsequently that he had suffered considerable loss through it, as indeed he said he had foreseen would be the case. He stipulated that he should be allowed to continue his practice as a barrister, with the sole condition that he should not appear against the Crown, but whereas his receipts had previously been £3,000 per annum, in the year that he acted as Colonial Secretary they were under £2,000. In addition to this loss of income he also had to suffer considerable unpleasances. During his tenure of office the Opium Farm was let, a new Opium Ordinance was passed, and Dr. Barrois accepted a retainer from the Farmer. This was made the subject of hostile criticism, and Dr. Barrois himself brought the matter before the Legislative Council and asked that body to investigate it. A Committee was appointed for that purpose, and they reported that though they held Dr. Bain as honourable and honest quite unsuspicious, yet they considered that he had not duly appreciated the demands of his high and important office and that he had been deficient in scrupulousness. Incidentally it is mentioned in the report as an undesirable state of things that Dr. Barrois should have held the offices of Acting Colonial Secretary and member of the Executive Council and at the same time retained the privilege of practising as a barrister. The undesirability is only a degree less in the case of a barrister appointed to act as a Magistrate.

to the formation of the veins applies equally here, for it is the same upheaval. The first vein, that lying east and west, presents very hopeful appearances, which I believe will be gold, in sight, to the north. The operations carried on at the depth will allow the thickness of the formation always increases. Even in the 100 fathoms worked by this syndicate I have noticed the richness gradually increase in proportion as the mine is carried down. I continue my journey across Gengenbach, a village, now, I am writing at the "Maur" after having crossed its tributary, the "Jagd," the "Jagd," the "Klang," &c. All of these have been worked as far as their alluvia is concerned. I arrive at the "Schild" and "Schne" after crossing the "Cheres" and the "Schabell," both flowing into the "Schild." I reach the

As to the general direction of my journey that can be ascertained by viewing it upon the map, and in picking out the points I have mentioned, you come direct into the territory of the settlement of Malaca after having traversed the whole extent of Gengenbach.

But if the traveller, having stationed himself on the frontier of Pahang, look towards the country in the direction of the region of the Pahang gold district, as I do, he will observe that all of these points lie to the west of the "upheaval" I have just indicated. If by these few lines I have been able to interest the reader so far as to induce some belief in my argument that the occurrence of gold in the Malay Peninsula is not only a characteristic of one country, but also of the whole, the settlement of Malaca, Gengenbach, North Borneo, and Pahang, I shall be entirely satisfied, for my object will have been attained.

OLLA PODRIDA.

The professor at the breakfast table once said: "A winter's walk is half a mile of good feeling and desire to make every effort about her whenever she goes, in an atmosphere of grace, energy, and peace of at least six feet radius, which wraps every human being upon whom she voluntarily bestows her presence, and affects him with the comfortable thought that she is rather glad he is alive than otherwise, isn't worth the trouble of talking to as a woman who may do enough to hold discussions with."

Some years ago Hiram Bricke Sr. bought a new safe for the old house at Polaris Spring. The man put it up, explained the combination and was away. Three weeks later some one said to the master: "I've got the safe open." said he, "Live it! It's a great secret. Something against borrows. No use to feel with that safe. I put all my money in it the day the man went away and there ain't one of us round there that's been able to open it since and the money's still there. For a safe it's first class, but for a bank to draw on it's better than a contribution box."

Beware of all forms of message or hard manipulation which run the reverse way of the down or hair which covers the body. Rheumatic pains may be rubbed upward from the extremities, but the reverse, except of the heart and death, yet nothing can be more injurious or sufficient to cause death. Injurious habits are often induced through ignorance of the curative indications of the occult power inherent in our nature, the knowledge of which, so far as we are known, should be represeated in our colleges by a professor's chair, than which there would not be a higher in this world so far as the vital interests of humanity are concerned.

In the Bench Court a man has been prosecuted against for stealing roses from a grave. The accused produced in court a copy of the inscription on the tablet over the grave, which ran as follows: "Hiram Bricke, a simple boy, of Salisbury Plains, New South Wales, was presented with 2,000 shares in the 'Atlas Engineering Company, of Sydney, as a marriage gift. If these had been 2,000 legs of dynamite, and had exploded on delivery they would have saved James' heap of trouble. The Company became bankrupt, and the shareholders who amounted to nearly 1,000, were left with individual liabilities ranging from £20 to £23,000, and James, it is now deserved, has to pay him a visit, spend a few hours with him, and pay him on certain topics, and shall have the full right to do so. His son, Mr. Gladstone, has not left at this proposal with the ardency expected—a circumstance which his correspondent finds some difficulty in understanding, with all the United States rapping through the two papers tollers all about the ex-Emperor in the privacy of his home."

Mr. Courtney is developing a very pretty will and becoming quite a proficient in the rarer courtesies. On the 11th August Sir James Ferguson remarked that Mr. Healy had read a speech of the type in a superior comic style. The member for Cork, on his rose to order and appealed to the Chairman to re-mark that this question was "not out of place, but of appreciation of style." Later on when Dr. Tanner was urging that it was his duty to his constituents to ascertain the Estimates very closely, the Chairman dryly remarked that the hon. member had not been brought up to the House to speak of the "style" of the Estimates. The description was of the Chairman's protestation against the Minister's right to apply the epithet "vulgar" to the country Irish gentleman. After Mr. Courtney expressed in an eloquent the sense of the House, "The author," he remarked, "is certainly not outside parliamentary usage, and sometimes, not without parliamentary justice." These words at once seem to relieve the sedentary mind of the discussion on the Estimates, and the House has reason to be grateful to its genial and witty Chairman.

A correspondent of "Penny Fair" tells the following interesting story:—The death of Sir Edward Waller, who had by his mind an anecdote of the fourth Lord Horford, who had derived his immense fortune. The Marquess of his preferences and mode of life was at first a Frenchman; and though an English nobleman he preferred to live amongst Frenchmen—Paris or at Margate. It was natural that he should be fond of the French fashion for being decorated. He was so affected by his French friends, that he adopted the French style of dress when he came over to England, especially to ask Lord Palmerston for the order in question. He demanded it as his right. Lord Palmerston admitted that in his position he had a right to expect the laurels; but, he added, "How I am to face the country, that would be raised about me, I do not know." A Marquess who neglects his country, he is told, is not fit to be a Marquess. "Then what, man?" said Lord Horford. "Why, go over to Ireland for six weeks or so to make yourself popular; get yourself talked about." Accordingly, the Marquess did go over to Ireland, and did make himself exceedingly popular, and popular in fact. So popular did he become, that the Marquess was invited on taking him to the top of a high hill, to be joyed. The day was hot, and the Marquess' ruffian was not in good training to undertake the steep ascent. As he got higher and higher, his patience ebbed lower and lower. Even the Marquess, who was not a man of iron, was about to give up the task when he got to the top, and when he did, he was so fatigued that he thought nothing of the heat or climb. And when he exclaimed, "Isn't it glorious?" "Yes," replied Lord Horford, wiping his face and pants, "yes, it is; but I hope to God I'll never see it again!"

A prisoner was being tried in an English court for murder, evidence against him being circumstantial; part of it a hat found near the scene of the crime—an ordinary round black hat, but sworn to as the prisoner's. Counsel for the defence, of course, made much of the evidence of his power, and of the most important of the evidence, the hat, was a sham. The man was acquitted. Just as he was leaving the dock, with the most touching humility and simplicity, he said: "If you please, my lord, may I see my hat?"

In the Berlin Law Courts of Justice, who was caught red-handed, has been prosecuted against for stealing "roses" from a prettily decorated grave. The accused in court read a copy of the inscription on the tablet over the grave, which read as follows: "Traveller, pause a moment and reflect on the love of a rose in a remembrance of the dead." You, gentlemen, no doubt will say, "What! a fellow creature to a shameful death on such a piece of evidence, and so on." Be it known that this was the last, leaving the dock, with the most touching humility and simplicity, he said: "If you please, my lord, may I see my hat?"
